...and Social Change", which served as a major impetus for him to get involved locally. This class inspired Daniel to help organize town-hall style meetings with Vice-Chancellor McCardell, and provided a platform for less heard voices on campus.

In addition to his inspiring professors and peers, Daniel commended his holistic liberal arts education for setting him up for success as a medical student. The confidence Daniel gained in his ability to write, as well as collaborate with others, all helped pave the way for his achievements in the medical world.

For current Sewanee students, Daniel's sage advice would be to "visit Career Services at least once a semester for a check in, no matter what your goals are." Their "willingness to go above and beyond and connect yo s
